BLIND BILLIE

WAS WELL KNOWN CHARACTER ABOUT TONOPAH DURING THE EARLY DAYS

Many of the old timers about Tonopah remember "Blind Billie" Brooks, who played the piano in a number of local resorts during the boom days of this camp. Billie is now in Reno, his old stamping ground, and the following article from the Gazette should prove interesting to friends and acquaintances of the well-known character:

ground, and the following article from the Gazette should prove interesting to friends and acquaintances of the well-known character:

Bereft of the sense of sight since tottering infancy, "Blind Billie" has developed the remaining four—he claims the remaining five—until he does not seem to feel the deprivation. Does not seem? It is a down-drooped smile that accompanies the word. There is just the faintest, most illy-concealed quaver in the voice when he makes this statement, and the fingers seem to grope out for something unattainable.

William Brooks is not as most blind men are, dependent upon others for the little ministrations which people with sight perform for themselves. He is more given to aiding than to being aided. He is more helpful than helped.

Everybody in Reno, almost everybody in Nevada, knows Blind Billy, who has just groped his way back from somewhere in the southern country. And Billy knows everybody. The voice, the handshake, the very presence of people who salute him, give him instantly a clue to their identity and there is scarce a moment of hesitation before he pronounces the name of one whom he has not "seen" for years.

The word "seen" is advisedly used, for Billie takes the initiative: "I am glad to see you again," is his greeting, and he does see in all respects save color, for his remaining senses make up the other lacks.

"May I use your typewriter? I want to write home to mother," is his first request upon entering a printshop, and the modern stenographer, no matter how well she has developed the touch system, might take lessons in accuracy from him.

Billie always has a dog with him. His dogs come and go, and perhaps it is better that the majority of them are gone, for they usually are mangy-looking brutes, without friends. That is why they tie to Billie and they accompany him so long as their fealty lasts.

Some years ago Billie and one of his canine acquisitions climbed to the summit of Winnemucca mountain. How they made the ascent nobody knows, but they made the trip, and the dog whined dolefully when Billie departed from Winnemucca.

A few days later a party of prospectors visited the summit and there, at the base of the flagpole, they found the carcass of the dog. He had wearily awaited the return of his master, and sought him in their parting place, the mountain summit.

Friends of Blind Billie remember a tragic period in the history of Tonopah, which was lightened by a little incident that gripped the heart. Billie was playing the piano in a gambling hall when the plague visited the camp. A woman was singing the songs of the hour to his accompaniment. She had been good to him, sharing her nightly wage before he became also an earner. Her hand guided him through the streets. When Billie was ill she nursed him, and her affection was as that of a sister toward a brother who needed kindly care.

One night when the "black" sickness was sorrowing the camp, the woman did not appear at the accustomed hour to entertain the miners who thronged the hall. Billie sat alone on the orchestra platform. He was there to play but not to sing. His fingers wandered idly over the keys and his heart throbbed for the woman who had been visited with the dread illness. As he passed from chord to chord, he struck the prelude to a song that was popular in those days, and he sang: "I'm Wearing My Heart Away for You."

Only those who heard the sweetness and the sadness, the longing and the prayer in his voice as the simple little ballad was sung, can understand. The fero players ceased nervously fumbling their checks; the ivory wheel stopped rolling at the roulette table; the room became as silent as though unoccupied, despite the fact that hundreds of rough-looking men, seeking pleasure and forgetfulness of the plague, were gathered there. It was one of the most dramatic scenes in the thrilling history of Nevada, but Blind Billie sang on oblivious of the people who hung upon his words. He did not seem to realize that the customary applause was lacking. He was only doing the best he could to fill the post and earn the stipend that might mean the recovery of the woman who had befriended him.

There have been songs in many keys in many camps, but none who were gathered in that gambling hall where laughter flaunted the sudden and mysterious death, will ever forget how Blind Billie sang "I'm Wearing My Heart Away for You."

AMUSEMENTS

Butler Theater

Tonight's program at the Butler theater is one of the best that has been shown at this popular place of amusement for some time, as follows: "Pathe Weekly of Current Events," showing interesting views from all over the world; "Cupid's Stolen Arrow," a Pathe trick film which is a scream from start to finish; "The Daughter of the Sheriff," a Kalem western drama, and a Biograph feature drama entitled "In the North Woods." A trapper, confident of the safety of his wife and child in the boundless woods while he is away on his trip to the trading post, a day's journey, leaves for that place to dispose of the pelts he has secured. He has just departed when an adventurous Frenchman and his guide saunter through the woods in search of game. From a distance the adventurer sees the trapper's wife place her bag of savings in its hiding-place. At once his cupid is aroused for his own purse is sadly depleted. However, the woman is made of stouter stuff than the ordinary female of the species and he not only fails but suffers for his at-
